Abstract. Over the past decade, North Atlantic security officials have become increasingly preoccupied with climate change. 2 This is not surprising. After all, climate change will likely prompt significant geopolitical competition as countries secure access to oil and natural gas, prevent food insecurities, and even cope with strategic challenges presented by the opening of Arctic sea routes ...

The “Securitization” of Climate-Induced Migration ...

The principal claim is that critical evaluation of the security dimensions of climate change and migration must begin with the epistemological challenge that knowledge about climate change and human migration is speculative and future-conditional. This introductory piece then provides short synopses of each article included in the special issue.

This paper looks at recent studies that have addressed climate change as a security issue. Posing climate change as a problem for security has provided it with a major boost in attention. However, it raises the potential of 'securitization', i.e. that the issue is primarily addressed via traditional means of security policy. The paper analyses how selected studies frame the issue of ...
