Whilst developing a PHP extension recently I spent quite a bit of time researching exactly how to create an extension, the best practices and the DocBook format of the PHP manual for documenting the extension.. By the time I finished writing the extension I had found some very good resources both on the web and in print. Printed books:

PHP is everything that C++ isn't when it comes to web development - a high-level scripting language designed mainly for web development. The description of PHP on the homepage sums it up nicely: PHP is a widely-used general-purpose scripting language that is especially suited for Web development and can be embedded into HTML.

I'm using it currently with standard PDF files as a workaround for embedding PDF files in the browser that need to use the Adobe PDF plugin rather than the browser's built-in PDF rendering. Even though my PDF files are standard (non-XML) files, they appear to load just fine with this new application type parameter.

Extending Embedded Python¶ Until now, the embedded Python interpreter had no access to functionality from the application itself. The Python API allows this by extending the embedded interpreter. That is, the embedded interpreter gets extended with routines provided by the application. While it sounds complex, it is not so bad.

Extending and Embedding PHP by Golemon S.

The book assumes you are already somewhat familiar with PHP internals and basically "throws you in the deep end" right away. It is also aimed at C programmers (the language PHP is written in); if you only know PHP, you will probably have a hard time creating an extension using only the information contained in this book.
